A few months ago, Argentinian President Mauricio Macri ordered his officials to find a solution to the problem of municipal floods that were becoming more frequent in a country hit by an "unprecedented disaster". Two weeks ago, the disaster worsened. Torrential rains brought by Hurricane Lorenzo have claimed the lives of more than 60 people across the country. Authorities said Saturday that more than 1,000 people were evacuated after heavy rains caused a dam to collapse in the city of Chalavista in the province of Santa Fe, killing at least 64 people and injuring at least 100 more. At least seven villages were destroyed and more than 50,000 hectares (125,000 acres) of crops were destroyed. The area still remains under a state of emergency. Argentina "is in an unprecedented disaster", Macri said in a tweet Saturday. "My condolences to the families of the victims, and I ask 77a5ca646e
