That can also mean that a child is not safe in a home where parents have a “high propensity to become violent,” she says. In addition, parents who have a history of domestic violence, drug or alcohol abuse, or who regularly use harsh discipline techniques can produce children who are more likely to be aggressive, Ms. Bolte-Ardolino says. Studies have also found that children who have been exposed to domestic violence at an early age are more likely to behave aggressively when their parents are around. Increasingly, experts are warning that even a history of minor forms of abuse can leave children vulnerable to later, more serious problems. For example, childhood abuse can lead to higher rates of anxiety, depression and substance abuse. These can all contribute to a higher risk of addiction, as well.

DEATHLESS AND UNBOUND: This book has been rewritten, edited, and updated to reflect today's world. This is a groundbreaking look at why so many young children are being killed in the home.

THE HOLOCAUST IN AMERICA: Martha Osterman, an associate professor of medicine at Emory University, is the lead author of "Battered Women and Their Children: The State of America's Foster Care System." From her research, she says, she has concluded that children raised in such homes are at higher risk of abuse, violence and other problems. While the government has tried to address the issue of children exposed to domestic violence, Ms. Osterman says, "Our research shows that we need to go beyond domestic violence." Children, she says, are particularly vulnerable to abuse because they "aren't able to talk back. They can't run away." "There is a huge burden for kids who are growing up in the foster care system," she says, adding that abuse is one of the most significant factors affecting the physical and emotional health of these children. "And there's a high level of violence in homes where abuse is happening," she says. "It's not just a perception." She warns that children who grow up in these homes are at higher risk of physical and emotional problems. "There are a number of pathways to getting to kids in foster care," she says. "Often, the family home is a site of abuse, and then that can 4bc0debe42
